Dear young men and women of The Class of 2008,

This is an exciting time. As you near adulthood and voting age, the Democratic party has two legitimate candidates for President: Barack Obama, the first African-American man with a good chance to represent his party, and Hillary Clinton, the first woman with a good chance to represent her party. In a very real sense, the presidential candidates are a metaphor for the kind of class you are at Brookline High. More than any class in our school's proud history, you have brought us closer to our dream of equity, in both our academic and social cultures. Your achievements and the relationships you've established reflect our diversity. That is no small thing. You are creating history. Congratulations on a successful journey; continue to honor freedom and responsibility, (It's not only a school thing.) and don't forget that Brookline High will always be one of your homes.

Great luck,
Dr. Bob

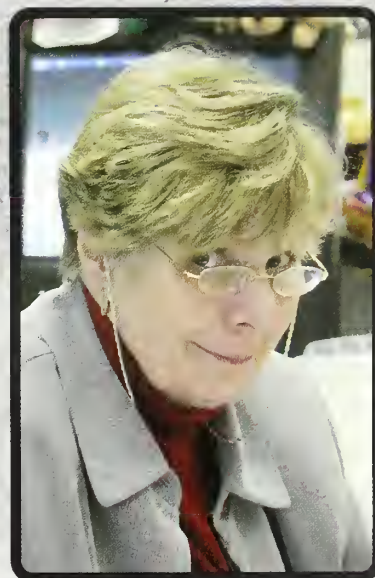

Mr. Victor G. Melehov
Assistant Headmaster

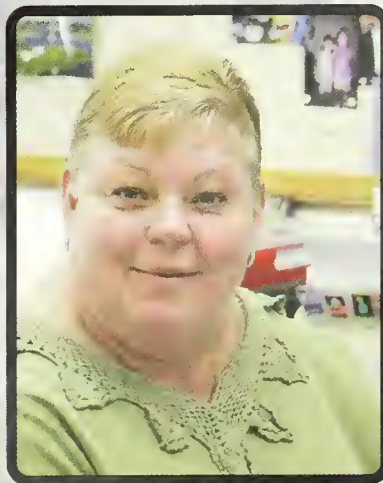

To the Class of 2008,

Graduating from Brookline High School is no small accomplishment. You have applied yourself for all these years, and now you have acquired a wealth of knowledge and experience. Invest with intelligence.

If they could change the world...

How Roger Grande's new social justice program plans to empower students aspiring to make a change in the world

By Rebecca Coven and Laura Sampson
News Editor and Contributing Writers Manager

On a Monday during F block, a small group of students spent their free block engaged in a deep discussion led by history teacher Roger Grande.

The students found themselves being forced to question what they would like to change in the world, a little weightier topic than most students worry about during their free blocks.

"What's your larger purpose?" Grande challenged each of the students, who were discussing different problems they saw in the world. "What is your actual motivation to help with this social justice issue?"

This seminar is one part of Grande's new social justice program at BHS, which focuses on how to make students active leaders who create change in different global causes that they care about.

Every two weeks, 25 juniors and seniors in the program attend a seminar either Z, C or F block, where they discuss articles and books that they have been assigned as well as the logistics of their activities in the program.

In addition to the seminars, the Social Justice program provides its participants with internships in a variety of social justice organizations in the Boston area.

To focus on learning leadership skills, the group also takes various field trips that serve as training sessions.

Earlier in the year, the group took an overnight trip to the City School in Dorchester, where they discussed issues of poverty and social class and experienced social justice first-hand by helping out at a homeless shelter.

Additionally, the group went on a day trip to Harvard Square where they visited the Democracy Center.

The idea for the social justice program arose when Sally Noteware, Program Liaison to the 21st Century Fund, approached Grande, who is also the faculty advisor for SAJE, in early 2005 with a pitch to start a social justice leadership program. With Noteware's assistance, Grande created a proposal for a program that the 21st Century Fund agreed to support.

Although it took almost two years to get off the ground, by the spring of 2007, Grande was sending out applications for the program and beginning to research and contact organizations to set up internships. In setting up the program, Grande kept his main objective in mind.

"The core goal [of the program] is to train and interest students to become life-long social justice advocates," he said. "I want students and young people...to see that they each have the ability to be a powerful person in terms of making change."

In his program, Grande encourages students to follow through with three steps for each of the issues they hope to create a change in.

First they must clarify their values, decide exactly what they feel is unfair and determine what improvements they want to see.

They should then attach themselves to a single issue that they care about most in order to optimize the results.

The last step they need to take is to actually campaign for their issue.

As a result of these steps, Grande expects each student to write a mission statement concerning the topic they have chosen by the end of the year.

The students have already begun their path on these three steps and this is evident in their seminar discussions as they question and learn from each other. Senior Barrie Grinberg is an example of one such student.

"I think a lot of people feel powerless in that they wonder, 'what does it matter if I don't turn off my lights when I leave?'" said Grinberg at a recent seminar on the issue of the environment.

"It's kind of like an optional homework assignment. You won't get extra credit, but we need to show people [that] what they do really does have an effect, even if it doesn't directly affect them."

The effects of change are exactly what Grande's program focuses on. He has his students consider two questions: Will this result in a real improvement in people's lives? What kind of people am I reaching?

Although it is a lot to take on, Grande feels that his students can handle all the program has to offer. As he was selecting his group, Grande looked for students who seemed genuinely "interested... passionate about making a change in the world," and it seems as if the students have met the standards so far.

"I applied because I have been interested in social justice issues for a while, but I wanted to learn how I could really get involved and be a 'leader' instead of just participating in different events or causes," said senior Amy Plovnick.

"Before starting the program, I never thought about why I wanted to get involved - I just did. Now I'm starting to think more about my role in the world and the reasons why I want to get involved in social justice," she said.

Similarly, senior Melanie Huttner is also looking to take her interest in helping her community to the next level.

"My goal [for the program] is to find area that I'm passionate about and to take my interest and my training from this year and continue to stay active in my chosen cause(s) next year in college," she said.

Grande now sets off on his goal to help transform Plovnick, Huttner and twenty three other passionate students into life-long social justice advocates in one school year.

Part one of a three-part series. Look for part two next month.

The gift of Hurricane Katrina

How the Hurricane helped one BHS senior

By Jacob Effron
Managing Editor

While many seniors struggle to think of a topic to write about for their college essay, Brookline High senior Steven Tenaglia knew just the topic. Tenaglia wrote about Hurricane Katrina, "the gift that keeps on giving" for him, as he said.

Tenaglia grew up in New Orleans. Similar to many other New Orleans residents, Tenaglia's house was flooded and his neighborhood ruined during Hurricane Katrina.

However, contrary to most victims of Katrina, Tenaglia does not believe that the hurricane had a negative impact on his life. In fact, he says it had a positive influence on him because it forced him to move to a new environment where he became a "happier person."

Growing up in New Orleans, Tenaglia considered himself to be very self-conscious and insecure, afraid that everyone around him would judge him. He partially attributed this insecurity to his parents' divorce.

"[I was] emotionally closed off [and] really controlling of who I let into my life," he said. "I didn't let people know who I was; I let them tell me who I was."

Tenaglia pinpoints a football game that he went to with his friends in New Orleans as the beginning of several events that would change his life. At the game, a friend casually mentioned Hurricane Katrina, which hadn't even happened yet. Tenaglia, then 16 years old, "didn't think the hurricane was a big deal."

His opinion quickly changed when he saw the highway leading out of New Orleans, as he and his mother, his only guardian, packed their bags and evacuated their hometown.

"It was crazy," he said. "People were crossing medians on the interstate. It was like anarchy, and the hurricane hadn't even hit yet."

When Tenaglia found out that in the aftermath of the hurricane, there was a water elevation of eight feet where his one-story house stood, he realized that he wasn't going home anytime soon.

"The hurricane started a weird turn of events, because my mom was [falling apart] and not able to look after me," said Tenaglia.

His mom refused to live with his dad, so the two found they had only one option: to live with Tenaglia's step-grandmother, Ronda Goodale. By Jacob Effron

At the game, a friend casually mentioned Hurricane Katrina, which hadn't even happened yet. Tenaglia, then 16 years old, "didn't think the hurricane was a big deal."

His opinion quickly changed when he saw the highway leading out of New Orleans, as he and his mother, his only guardian, packed their bags and evacuated their hometown.

"It was crazy," he said. "People were crossing medians on the interstate. It was like anarchy, and the hurricane hadn't even hit yet."

When Tenaglia found out that in the aftermath of the hurricane, there was a water elevation of eight feet where his one-story house stood, he realized that he wasn't going home anytime soon.

"The hurricane started a weird turn of events, because my mom was [falling apart] and not able to look after me," said Tenaglia.

His mom refused to live with his dad, so the two found they had only one option: to live with Tenaglia's step-grandmother, Ronda Goodale, mother of BHS alumnus Adena Gabrielle Walker. Tenaglia had only met her once, when he was seven.

The transition to Brookline was hard, and Tenaglia fell into his old habits of being a follower as he sat quietly with the kids he thought he "wanted to be like," but things began to change for Tenaglia during the spring of his sophomore year.

"I had this huge epiphany, where I realized that the people I was sitting with at lunch weren't the people I felt most comfortable around, and I went to sit with other people. At this point, I actually started to like Brookline," said Tenaglia.

Tenaglia grew to enjoy living in Brookline so much that when his mom returned to New Orleans and asked him to come home in October of his junior year, he forcefully responded that he would not.

"I'd become accustomed to the more liberal attitude of Brookline," he said. "I'd come out of my shell and that was the greatest feeling in the world. So I didn't really want to go back and feel closed in again."

With the help of Goodale, Tenaglia was able to remain in Brookline while his mother continued to live in New Orleans.

With his mother gone, Tenaglia is now living without either of his parents for the first time and believes that he has become much more responsible because of this situation.

"For the first time, there was nobody saying, 'It's 5:00, start your homework,'" he said. In addition to making decisions like how to spend his money, Tenaglia took the initiative to enroll in dance classes and other extracurricular activities that interested him without help from others.

"If my mom had stayed in Brookline, I wouldn't have developed my want to try new things and my free-willed nature," he said.

These newfound qualities are apparent in Tenaglia's role as a vibrant member of the BHS community, from the chorus room for Testostones' rehearsals to the 4th floor for his SWS classes.

Recently, Tenaglia was able to reflect on his experiences as he brainstormed for his college essay. From all of his tumultuous experiences, Tenaglia has only one regret. "I wish I realized I didn't fit in with the 'cool kids' during those first six months [at BHS]."

Because of the person he has become since moving to Brookline, Tenaglia emphatically stated, "Hurricane Katrina is the greatest thing that ever happened to me."

METCO In The Spotlight

After Supreme Court decision, program faces an uncertain future

By Jacob Effron
Managing Editor

Not much can make a student wake up at 6:00 AM. Yet that's just what BHS senior Sakeenah Chapman has willingly done every weekday since first-grade because that's what it takes to get from her house in Jamaica Plain to school in Brookline on time.

Chapman is one of 300 minority students participating in the METCO program in the Brookline school system and one of 100 at the high school.

The Metropolitan Council for Educational Opportunity (METCO) program is a state-wide program in 35 suburban schools surrounding Boston and Springfield that enrolls inner city minorities in suburban schools. METCO is funded by the state and made possible by the 1966 Racial Imbalance Act, which says that schools can adopt plans to combat racial imbalance and isolation in their districts. 42.5 percent of the African-American students and 8.5 percent of the Latino students in the Brookline school district are part of the METCO program.

Chapman thinks her mother signed her up for METCO because "she wanted me to get the best education I could get and saw METCO as the way to do that," she said.

"People are willing to make sacrifices to get a better education because it gives you a leg up."

For Chapman, part of this sacrifice is getting up early, a small price to pay, she believes, for the educational and social benefits she gets in return.

METCO has proven successful in helping students to succeed academically. Eighty-seven percent of the mostly African-American and Latino participants graduate high school as opposed to the state-wide graduation rate of 64.9 percent for African-Americans and 56.9 percent for Latinos. In Brookline, 95 percent of students in METCO go on to institutions of higher education.

While she acknowledges the importance of the educational benefits, Chapman believes the social benefits of METCO are equally valuable.

"I love the fact that there are so many different people here and that they're so nice and willing to talk to you... being in Boston kind of secludes you from people who are white," she said. Positive feelings about the current program, like those expressed by Chapman, are the precise reasons why only minority students are allowed to participate in METCO. All minority students are allowed into the program, regardless of economic status. However, a recent Supreme Court decision has made the future of the program uncertain.

On June 28, 2007, the Supreme Court voted five to four to strike down voluntary integration plans used by the Seattle, WA and Jefferson County, KY school districts. However, five justices on the Supreme Court recognized compelling interests in preventing racial isolation and achieving a diverse student population in the K-12 context. The court was deeply divided on the use of race as the sole factor in assigning kids to public schools.

The law office of Hogan & Hartson, which served as co-counsel representing the Seattle school district, believes the court's ruling against the challenged race-conscious programs established as unconstitutional any public school program that chooses kids to enter their school solely considering race. Furthermore, Hogan & Hartson advised schools using these programs to carefully reexamine their programs.

Based on this decision, some may assert that METCO should change its admissions process to admit residents of the inner city regardless of race. But METCO proponents believe that it is its use of race as a sole factor that makes it such a valuable program.

"I think there is a huge benefit to going to school with different people," said Sujana Talukdar, the Brookline K-8

METCO director.

"You learn to interact with people at a young age and our society is always changing and becoming more diverse, and that's really what's going to be necessary in this 21st century."

Talukdar said this advantage was both for white students in Brookline, who are exposed to kids they would not normally be exposed to, and the students in the program who get to interact outside of their mostly minority neighborhoods.

"If METCO wasn't focused on race, I'm not sure there would be as much benefit for having the program," said Talukdar.

BHS METCO coordinator Christopher Vick agreed saying that, "If the state believes that there should be racial diversity in schools then they've got to take the steps."

Others were angered by the court's decision because of its "denial" of the disadvantages minorities face.

"Hearing METCO and immigration questioned makes you wonder whether this is 2007," said Jeannette Huezo, a parent of a student in METCO. "It's still true that in this society, if you are not light-skinned, you don't get good opportunities."

"The Right is saying it's racist to talk about race," said Paul Marcus, the head of the organization Community Change. "It's like the Right is saying, 'now we'll have a fair race,' but it's between a US track star and someone with 200 pounds on their back."

For now, it seems that METCO will continue operating under the same procedure. In a statement, Dr. Jean M. McGuire, Executive Director of METCO, said that the program could "potentially be challenged," but that "ardent opponents of the use of race... were not given the slam dunk authority from this decision."

McGuire said METCO will review its policies so that it can withstand any possible constitutional challenges based on the precedent set by the recent Supreme Court decision.

As to what changes the Brookline METCO program will make due to the decision, Talukdar said, "Right now there's nothing to change. There's a lot of preparation and guessing, but there's nothing that will change right at this moment until a court challenge happens."

True representatives are elected, not selected

Dean-selected Student Cabinet infringes on the rights of student elected Student Council

By Matthew Rizman
Staff Writer

Dean Adrian Mims described them as "responsible students" who can "articulate their point of view." Headmaster Bob Weintraub described them as "a good group of kids" that "reflect Brookline High."

With such positive feedback from the school administration, why wouldn't students want the hand-picked Student Cabinet to voice their concerns?

Unfortunately, the Cabinet has not created an additional voice, but an overpowering one.

Because students have already elected a Student Council to do so.

Members of Student Cabinet, 12 students selected by their deans, meet Weintraub once weekly and discuss school issues.

"Usually [Weintraub] presents a proposal or an issue to talk about," said junior Cabinet member Adam Ruprecht. "We just give him our feedback and give him little tips about what to change around."

Weintraub reflects on this feedback and changes school policies accordingly.

"It's all about a learning experience for me," said Weintraub. "I get an opportunity to translate what [Student Cabinet] says into the way I run Brookline High School."

There is no conspiracy here. Student Cabinet was not created to undermine Student Council but to provide Weintraub with student input.

"If anything, [Student Cabinet] is good for students," said Mims, "because it's an additional voice voicing their concerns."

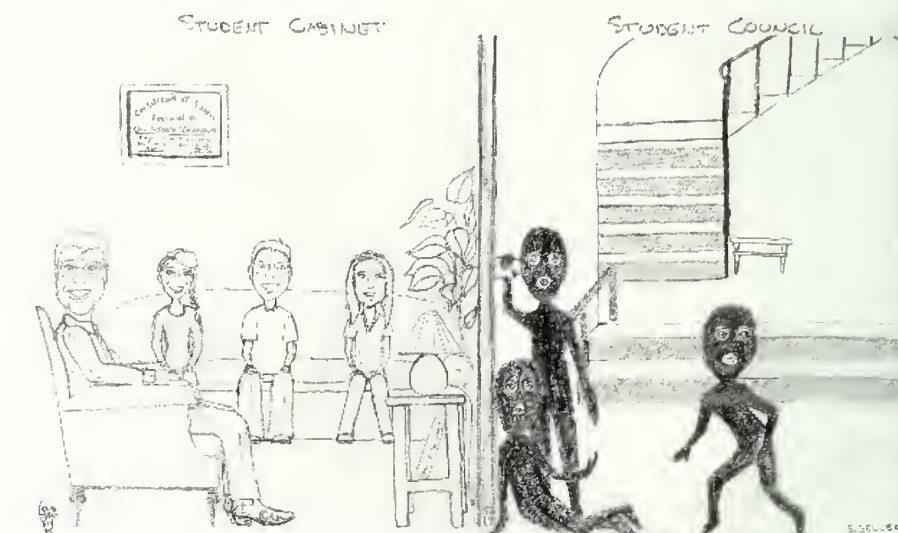

Unfortunately, the Student Cabinet has not created an additional voice, but an overpowering one. While it was not intended to do so, the creation of Student Cabinet has taken away one of the basic rights of Student Council—the right to represent its students to the administration.

The members of Student Cabinet do not directly affect school policy. They simply give advice that Weintraub can choose to accept; however, this seemingly small responsibility is currently assigned to Student Council, a peer-elected branch of student government that both creates its own laws and advises those of the administration.

Student Council, part of the Legislative branch of student government, consists of 23 peer-elected students. Seventeen of these students have the power to vote on laws while the remaining six are elected without voting privilege.

Without the power to vote, it is the responsibility of the final six members to hear the concerns of their peers and voice them, both to the Legislature and the administration, in an effort to have school policies changed.

Sound familiar? These are almost the exact same responsibilities of the Student Cabinet. The key distinction is that Student Council members are elected by their peers and speak for the student body, while Student Cabinet forces Student Council to "listen in" on decisions they should be making.

Student Cabinet members are chosen by their deans and speak for themselves.

A.J. Fajnzylber, one of the six Student Council members without lawmaking privileges. He believes that Student Cabinet is unfairly assuming the duties of Student Council.

"[Student Council] is supposed to be finding the concerns and being the representative body of the students," said Fajnzylber.

"Even if [Student Cabinet members] aren't making any laws, they are still infringing on the Student Council's right to see problems and deal with them."

Fajnzylber's concern is not based on the quality of the Student Cabinet's advice, but rather the principle of its existence. He believes that the creation of the dean-chosen Student Cabinet symbolizes giving up on student democracy.

"[Student Cabinet] belittles the efforts of the real Student Government," said Fajnzylber, "because it makes [Student Council] seem as if we don't get anything done."

Fajnzylber admitted that Student Council was often inefficient, but he attributed much of the inefficiency to the school administration.

He cited an example in which Student Council members had asked both Weintraub and assistant headmaster Victor Melehov multiple times for something simple: to correctly hang two flags that were upside down outside the cafeteria. Despite constant face-to-face and e-mail communication, it took over a month for the flags to be fixed.

"People wonder why we're inefficient? We are very efficient, we get stuff done in our meetings," Fajnzylber said. "Even if we get stuff done, often we are kind of ignored, and often people think our decisions aren't real ones."

Ignoring the Student Council does not just hurt Fajnzylber and his members; it hurts the student body as well. Through Student Council, students are given the democratic power to choose their peers that they believe will make the best effort to address their concerns.

Without the assurance of the importance of this body, students cannot expect Student Council to yield them any results.

"This year, the people who are on [Student Council] are not just the popular kids. They are the kids that people have seen in the past really making a difference," said Fajnzylber.

"Maybe [Student Cabinet] will make decisions faster, but whose decisions are those?"

High school obviously cannot be an entirely democratic institution. Nevertheless, through a peer-elected government, students can have some say in the policies relevant to their high school experience.

You could ask any student: who knows students better, their peers or their school administration? The answer would be unanimous. In that case, how could the administration choose better student representatives than the ones students chose themselves?

BHS takes a look at gender in the classroom

By Rebecca Coven and Rebecca Scharfstein
News Editor and Co-Editor-In-Chief

Senior Julia Sheehy-Chan's Honors English class and her AP Calculus BC math class share one thing in common: in each, her peers view her differently because of her gender.

According to Sheehy-Chan, girls play a more dominant role than boys in her English class, while just the opposite is the case in her math class.

"[In math,] guys seem to be the ones that everyone asks for the answer. They're the ones that always get the really hard questions on tests," she said. "Well that's the stereotype."

Is it really just a stereotype that boys perform better in math classes and girls excel in English classes, or is it a reality at BHS?

Many teachers and students feel that this stereotype plays an important role in achievement.

One such person is Laurie Sheffield, who has been teaching American Literature, a standard-level junior English course, for the past three years. This year, Sheffield has one class that is almost entirely boys: there are only three girls in the 16-person class.

However, Sheffield does not feel that this is generally the case in other standard-level English classes at BHS. What she has noticed, however, is a significant increase in recent years in the difference between gender enrollment in the honors-level classes, where there are more girls than boys.

She attributes this to "subtle permission" that society gives boys to not do well in English classes and a similar type of permission that girls are given in math.

Similarly, head of the English department, Mary Burchenal, feels that society may put slightly more pressure on girls that makes them lean towards English classes.

"I think there's more expectation that girls are verbal and therefore from an early age... girls tend to be more verbal [and] boys tend to be more active," said Burchenal. "I think that carries through a little bit."

Unlike what some English teachers

see in their classes, head of the Math department, Jim Bosman, does not see much significant imbalance between genders in math course enrollment, despite what the numbers say. (See sidebar for enrollment statistics.) What he does see, however, is that when students drop down to lower-level courses, they tend to be girls more often than boys.

"I think some [psychologists] make the conclusion that it's because of... expectations," said Bosman of any imbalance in gender enrollment in math courses.

"Often times, people believe that it's expected that the males do better in math than the females. As the kids go to the high school, they encounter teachers that expect the boys to do better than the girls in mathematics and vice versa in the humanities."

Although the differences in enrollment between genders seem to exist in various math and English classes, few teachers see a significant difference in the grades that the different genders receive.

English teacher Christina Anderson noticed a balance in her honors-level American Literature classes. She says that the grades between the genders are a "pretty even mix."

"This year I feel like I have some very strong male students and female students," said Andersen.

Even though the genders may receive similar grades, that does not stop some people from believing in the stereotype, as Sheehy-Chan has seen first-hand.

"[Boys] automatically assume that I am less smart than them because I am a girl. They always compete with each other and they never include me in the competition."

But perhaps it is possible that the stereotype contains some grains of truth at times. When one gender is achieving slightly better grades than the other, some teachers attribute it to the fact that boys and girls are simply built differently.

Sheffield, who does not notice one gender receiving better grades than the other in her classes, did acknowledge it is more common for boys to "tank."

Both she and Burchenal feel that some boys at the high school level simply aren't at a developmental level to think critically about certain books or discussions in English courses. It is also possible that the courses offered at BHS simply cater to the needs of one gender over the other. One example of this is that some teachers feel that boys do not enjoy participating in discussions as much as girls.

This year in AP B.C. Calculus, 63 percent of the students are male and 37 percent are female. For more statistics, see box on page 6. (Cartoon by Roxanne Calderwood)

"The idea of discussion as an end in itself is something... that I think girls are more likely to buy into whole-heartedly than boys," said Burchenal, admitting that she might be over-generalizing.

"Boys like competition, they like debate, or they get in teams... I sometimes think that boys feel that when we're discussing things and it's just everybody gives their own opinion, we're not learning... Whereas girls, I think, are a little more lenient about that and might be more willing to say that discussions are important and 'I like to be able to say what I think.'"

Ellen Lewis, who teaches Responding to Literature, an honors freshman course, and Biography and Autobiography, a senior Standard course, noticed that many books taught in the English courses at the freshman level are "boy books," or books with dominant male characters. She noted that girls will typically read books that appeal to boys, yet some boys will not read books that are considered "girl books."

But that is freshman year, and by junior year, honors English classes have a significantly greater proportion of girls.

across four or five times in life. It faced, or seemed to face, the whole external world for an instant and then concentrated on you with an iron prejudice in your favor. It understood you just as far as you wanted to be understood, believed in you as you would like to believe in yourself. The truth was that Jay Gatsby, of West Egg, Long Island, sprang from his Platonic conception of himself. He was a part of God, a phrase which, if it means anything, means just that—and he must have been so, to win her, to give her the right of his business, the service of his ridiculous beauty. So Gatsby turned out all right for the party. He was Jay Gatsby that a seventeen-year-old girl is likely to invent, and to ships and sleighs. This has been a story, Daisy at last. Perhaps we will see which life. Future that is will Burchenal feels that in order to appeal to boys more in these English courses, maybe more books science-fiction books and non-fiction books should be taught.

According to Pricilla Burbank-Schmitt, who teaches Advanced Analysis Calculus, non-leveled Statistics and AP Calculus AB, teachers in the math department are increasing efforts to make their courses more appealing to both genders by doing things such as incorporating more writing and group work into their lessons.

"It's really important for girls not to feel like they're being put on the spot," said Burbank-Schmitt. "They're sometimes less willing to take a risk, so when you work in groups they get a chance to talk about problems first."

The math department is taking the first steps in examining gender differences in their department.

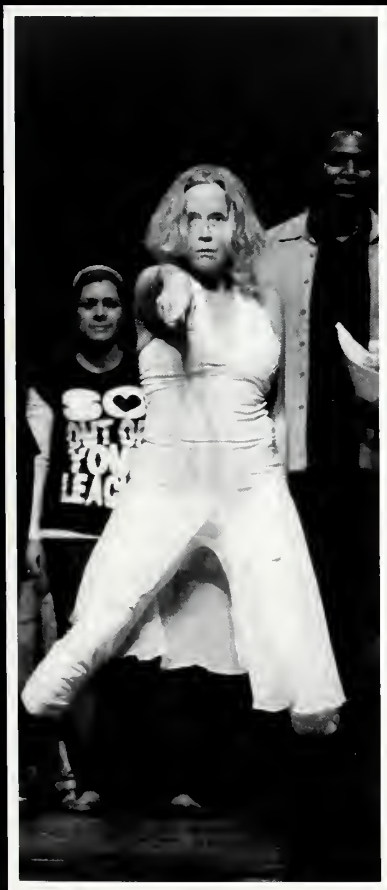

In December 2006, teachers surveyed the freshman class on their achievement and sentiments about their math course. Bosman says that he hopes to resurvey the same class in their senior year and repeat this same survey in the future.

With the math department beginning to examine the differences between genders, it may be time for others to do the same?

The arrow slowly falls

Phasing out the warrior symbol

By Adam Sege

Last year's controversy over Brookline High's school symbol, a feathered arrow, had a polarizing effect on the school community. On one side, people argued for the immediate removal of the arrow, while others were just as vocal in their support for the controversial symbol. Luckily, our school administration has chosen a more moderate path for the arrow.

On Nov. 11, Headmaster Bob Weintraub discussed the symbol's future with Superintendent Bill Lupini and Athletic Director Pete Rittenburg. The main outcome of that meeting was the decision to gradually phase out the arrow symbol. Each season, the school buys new uniforms for a small number of teams, and for now, the only symbol on new uniforms will be a generic "B."

This decision lets our school be politically correct while saving money in the face of looming budget deficits. From a moral standpoint, this sends the message that we do not tolerate the stereotyping of Native American people or anyone else.

"The right thing to do is to not have a symbol for your school that represents a group of people," said Weintraub.

Yet replacing the arrow immediately had been estimated to cost $75,000, said School Committee Chair Judy Meyers.

"It's not easy to come up with $75,000, given the fact that we're facing future budget deficits," Meyers said, while quickly adding that there are ways to raise this money that do not draw from the school budget.

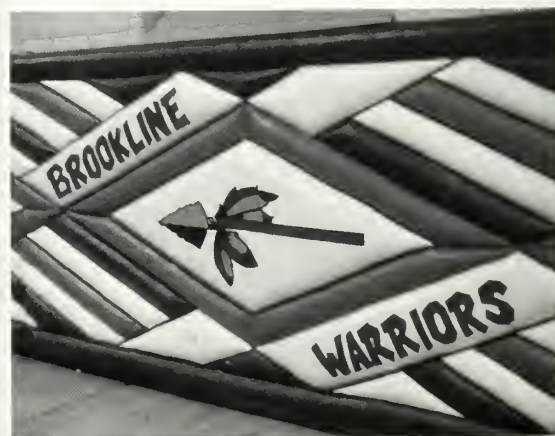

Rather than scrambling for this money, however, the school administration wisely chose to take a more gradual approach. It may take years to phase out the symbol completely, but by replacing team uniforms using the existing cycle, there will be no new costs, Weintraub and Lupini indicated.

According to Weintraub, the school will let students take the lead in choosing a new symbol. Student Council held a logo contest last year, but there were not many entries, and neither Legislature nor the headmaster was impressed with the proposed symbols.

But this year, both Student Council and the student body will have an incentive to work harder to replace the arrow. Each season that passes without a new symbol, a fresh set of uniforms will arrive sporting our interim symbol, the "B." Now, as intimidating as letters are, it will be in everyone's interest to choose a new symbol quickly.

We want to go to a school that practices what it preaches about tolerance, and replacing the feathered arrow is a good place to start. At the same time, we should not be so politically correct that we take money away from teachers or classrooms to finance our school symbol.

The best way forward is a gradual phase-out, with no new costs, and it seems like our school administration has realized that.

The school plans to replace the arrow symbols around the school, like this one in the Schlutz Gym. (Photo by Adam Sege)

Sports injuries: how much is too much?

Injured athlete gets treated in the Sports Medicine office.

By Nika Ouellette
Staff Writer

David Wilson's hip was hurting. He didn't know why. He wasn't running on it and yet his hip was hurting. Just back from December vacation with two workouts a day, Wilson's hip flexor gave out.

"I pulled or strained or tore my hip flexor and the muscle in my hip area," said Wilson, a junior and a Brookline High School runner.

This epidemic of athletes pushing too hard through injuries and, as a result, shutting their seasons down early, is more common than one might think.

"Most athletes have a high threshold for pain," said Gina Smith, part-time athletic trainer for BHS. "The big problem is [athletes] don't stretch properly. Most people don't have the patience to hold stretches that long."

This is not the only reason athletes are getting injured and staying injured today. When an athlete pushes too hard coming off of an injury, or just pushes too hard in general, problems can erupt.

An athlete may not listen to their own body telling them when enough is enough, as in David Wilson's case. This seemingly harmless act can cause problems down the road.

"I'd had a week in which, not necessarily overdoing it in that I was training too hard, I probably should've listened to the twinges and backed off the training a little, but I didn't," said Wilson, who has not yet returned to running.

All of the muscles in the body are connected, and they are bound by ligaments and tendons. If an athlete injures their foot and begins limping, soon the muscle they are limping with grows agitated, and the next thing they know, their slight sprain has turned into an even worse sprain over a larger area. This can ruin a few weeks of a season, whereas the initial injury may have only taken a few days to heal.

"Muscles are all connected and can cause tendon rupture [when injuries are ignored]," said Smith. Basically, when small injuries are ignored, bigger ones can, and likely will occur, as Wilson knows firsthand.

In recent years, concussions have become a frequent sports injury, especially in contact sports.

"When concussions aren't filed, that's when it gets serious, it can cause long term injuries," said Smith. A few years ago, former Patriots linebacker, Ted Johnson accused head coach Bill Belichick of exposing him to on-field contact too soon after a concussion. This has been the case in some high schools along with athletes not reporting their injury and returning to the gridiron far too soon following head injuries, which has trainers worried nationwide.

Smith attributes this behavior to the reputation that football, and other contact and high risk sports have as "manly." She said that as soon as football season ends, she has a line outside her door of athletes who have hurt themselves in previous weeks and wait until the end of the season to tell her.

Athletes don't want to be seen as wimps, and definitely don't want to be out of commission, so they play. If they do so, they risk being injured longer than necessary, and potentially ruin their seasons or careers.

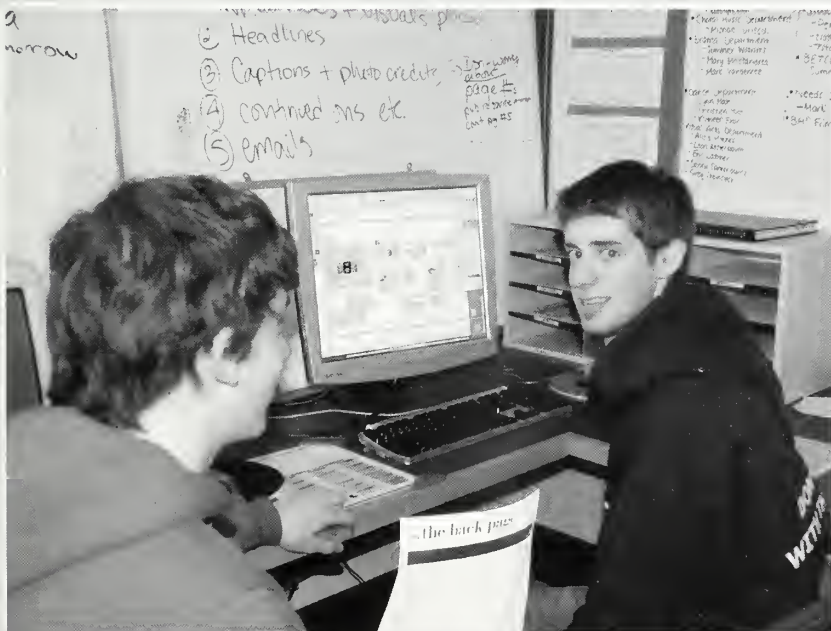

This fate is common among high school students, especially those who believe that they are immune to injury. Being hurt is one thing, being ignorant of an injury is another. It is absolutely necessary that athletes report their injuries lest they end up out of commission and an athlete no longer.

For high school athletes, prevention is the most important thing to do in sports. With bodies still growing and filling out, a ligament strain or other injury could seriously damage a young body and shut down not only a season, but a career.

"I'm here to prevent further injuries. I'm not going to take you out unless it's absolutely medically necessary," warned Smith, fearing athletes only avoid going to the trainer because they are scared of not being able to play.

In general, this is a rational fear. No athlete wants to be taken out and not be able to play. However, athletes need to be able to listen to their bodies and understand what their limits are. Playing injured can result in more injuries and could ruin a season or a future of a young or older athlete.

Studying the Language of Music

by Michael Motenko

First I sit down at the piano
And learn the grammar look at the chords, study the conjugations get all the flats, sharps, tones and fingerings accents, stresses, syllables and spelling

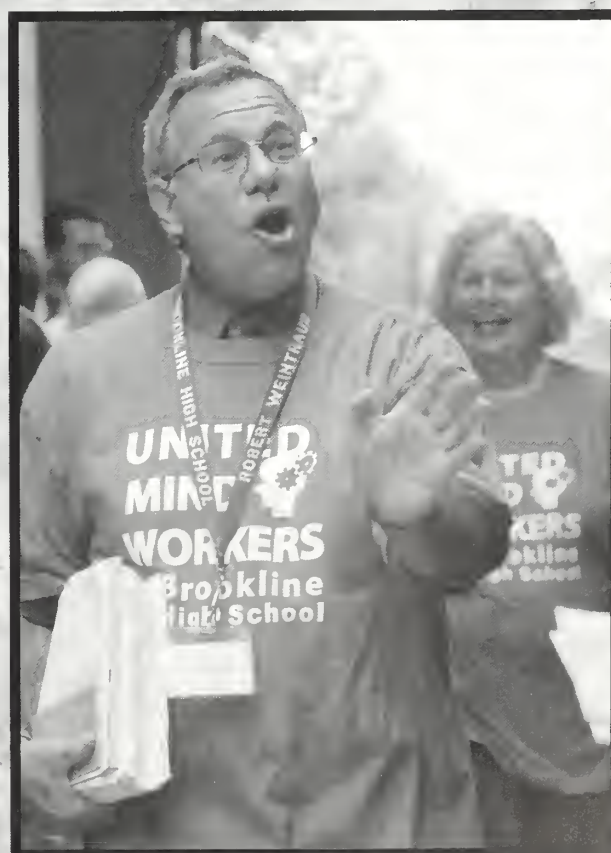

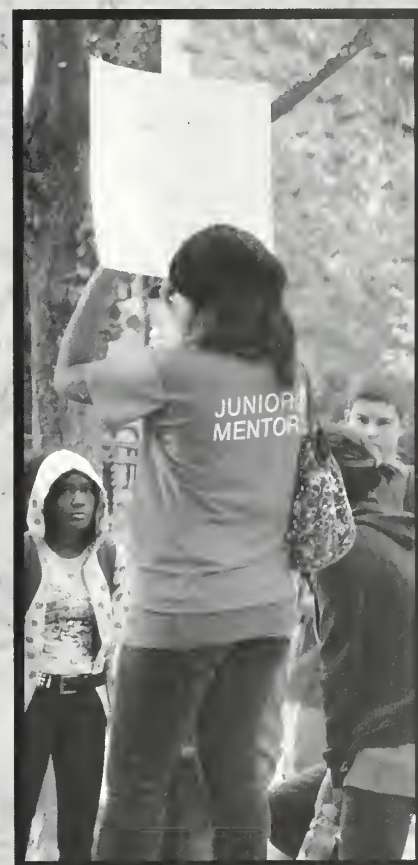

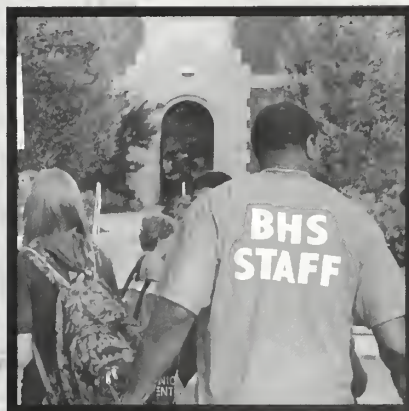

Then I talk
The fingers sort out the endings, moods and tenses conveying what I want, need and feel
The fingers ask questions, state feelings
Try their best to start conversation

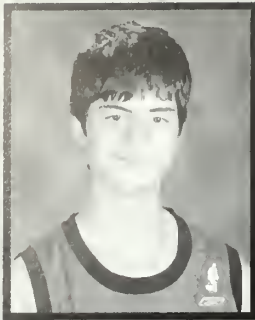

More practice
Brings more solid language
My fingers take less breaks less hesitation between words

Until, one day
I'm fluent
Words come with ease
Notes fly off the glossy keys
Now shining with Personality and Expression

Dear Class of 2008,
You are an amazing class; you set a wonderful standard for the school, and make it fun to come to work each day! As you look ahead to all that awaits you, we hope you will remember BHS as a place where you grew intellectually and personally; where you felt safe enough to express your beliefs and challenged enough to question them; where you contributed to the larger community in the full spirit of freedom AND responsibility; and where you felt well-cared for along the way. We will miss you.
With love, Your Dean's Team

China Exchange BROOKLINE HIGH SCHOOL - GAO XIN NO 1 HIGH SCHOOL 2007-2008

Brookline is into its ninth year of cultural and educational exchange with its sister city of Xian, China. Strictly speaking, the exchange program is centered in the high schools BHS and the Xians Gao Xin No. 1 High School.

Each fall semester, from around September 1 until the end of January eight students (all tenth graders) and one teacher arrive from China to live and learn in Brookline. The eight students are enrolled in main stream classes at BHS. Nine homes take in the members of the visiting Gao Xin group. The experience of hosting is alternatively hilarious and worrisome; certainly unforgettable and invaluable for all involved.

In February, around the Chinese New Year, both groups travel to China. Our own BHS students start their adventure in Xian. Students are immersed in the language, culture, forging new friendships and widening horizons. Every morning they participate in regular classes. In the afternoon they follow a schedule in Modern Chinese History, Language, Literature and Chinese arts and crafts with our own teacher from Brookline. The four+ months culminate in a trip the group takes together to the region of their choice in China.

The programs network of students, teachers, hosts and supporters has grown at a remarkable pace. When a student with family enters this network, they can count on broad support and can delight in being part of a deeply moving history between two school, two cities, two countries!

Congratulations,
Nika !

Katy Ruderman

You have shown such incredible courage, perseverance, and grace for so long. Our darling daughter plagued by poor health for three years of high school. No one deserves to endure what you have, least of all you. You have come through it all - always smiling and with a diploma. We are very proud of you!

We are so grateful to Coach Joel Skaliotis, Guidance Counselor Ellen Herz and Dean Lindsay Murphy for their compassion and unfailing support of Katy.

So many teachers - Laura Abineri, John Andrews, Ziv Feldman, Craig Friedland, Robert Grant, Gaelen Harrington, Jean Klingler, Bruce Mallory, Julia Speyer, Lexi Thompson, and Jessica Wender-Shubow - have done so much to support Katy along the way. We thank you for your flexibility and caring.

With much love,

Class of 1961

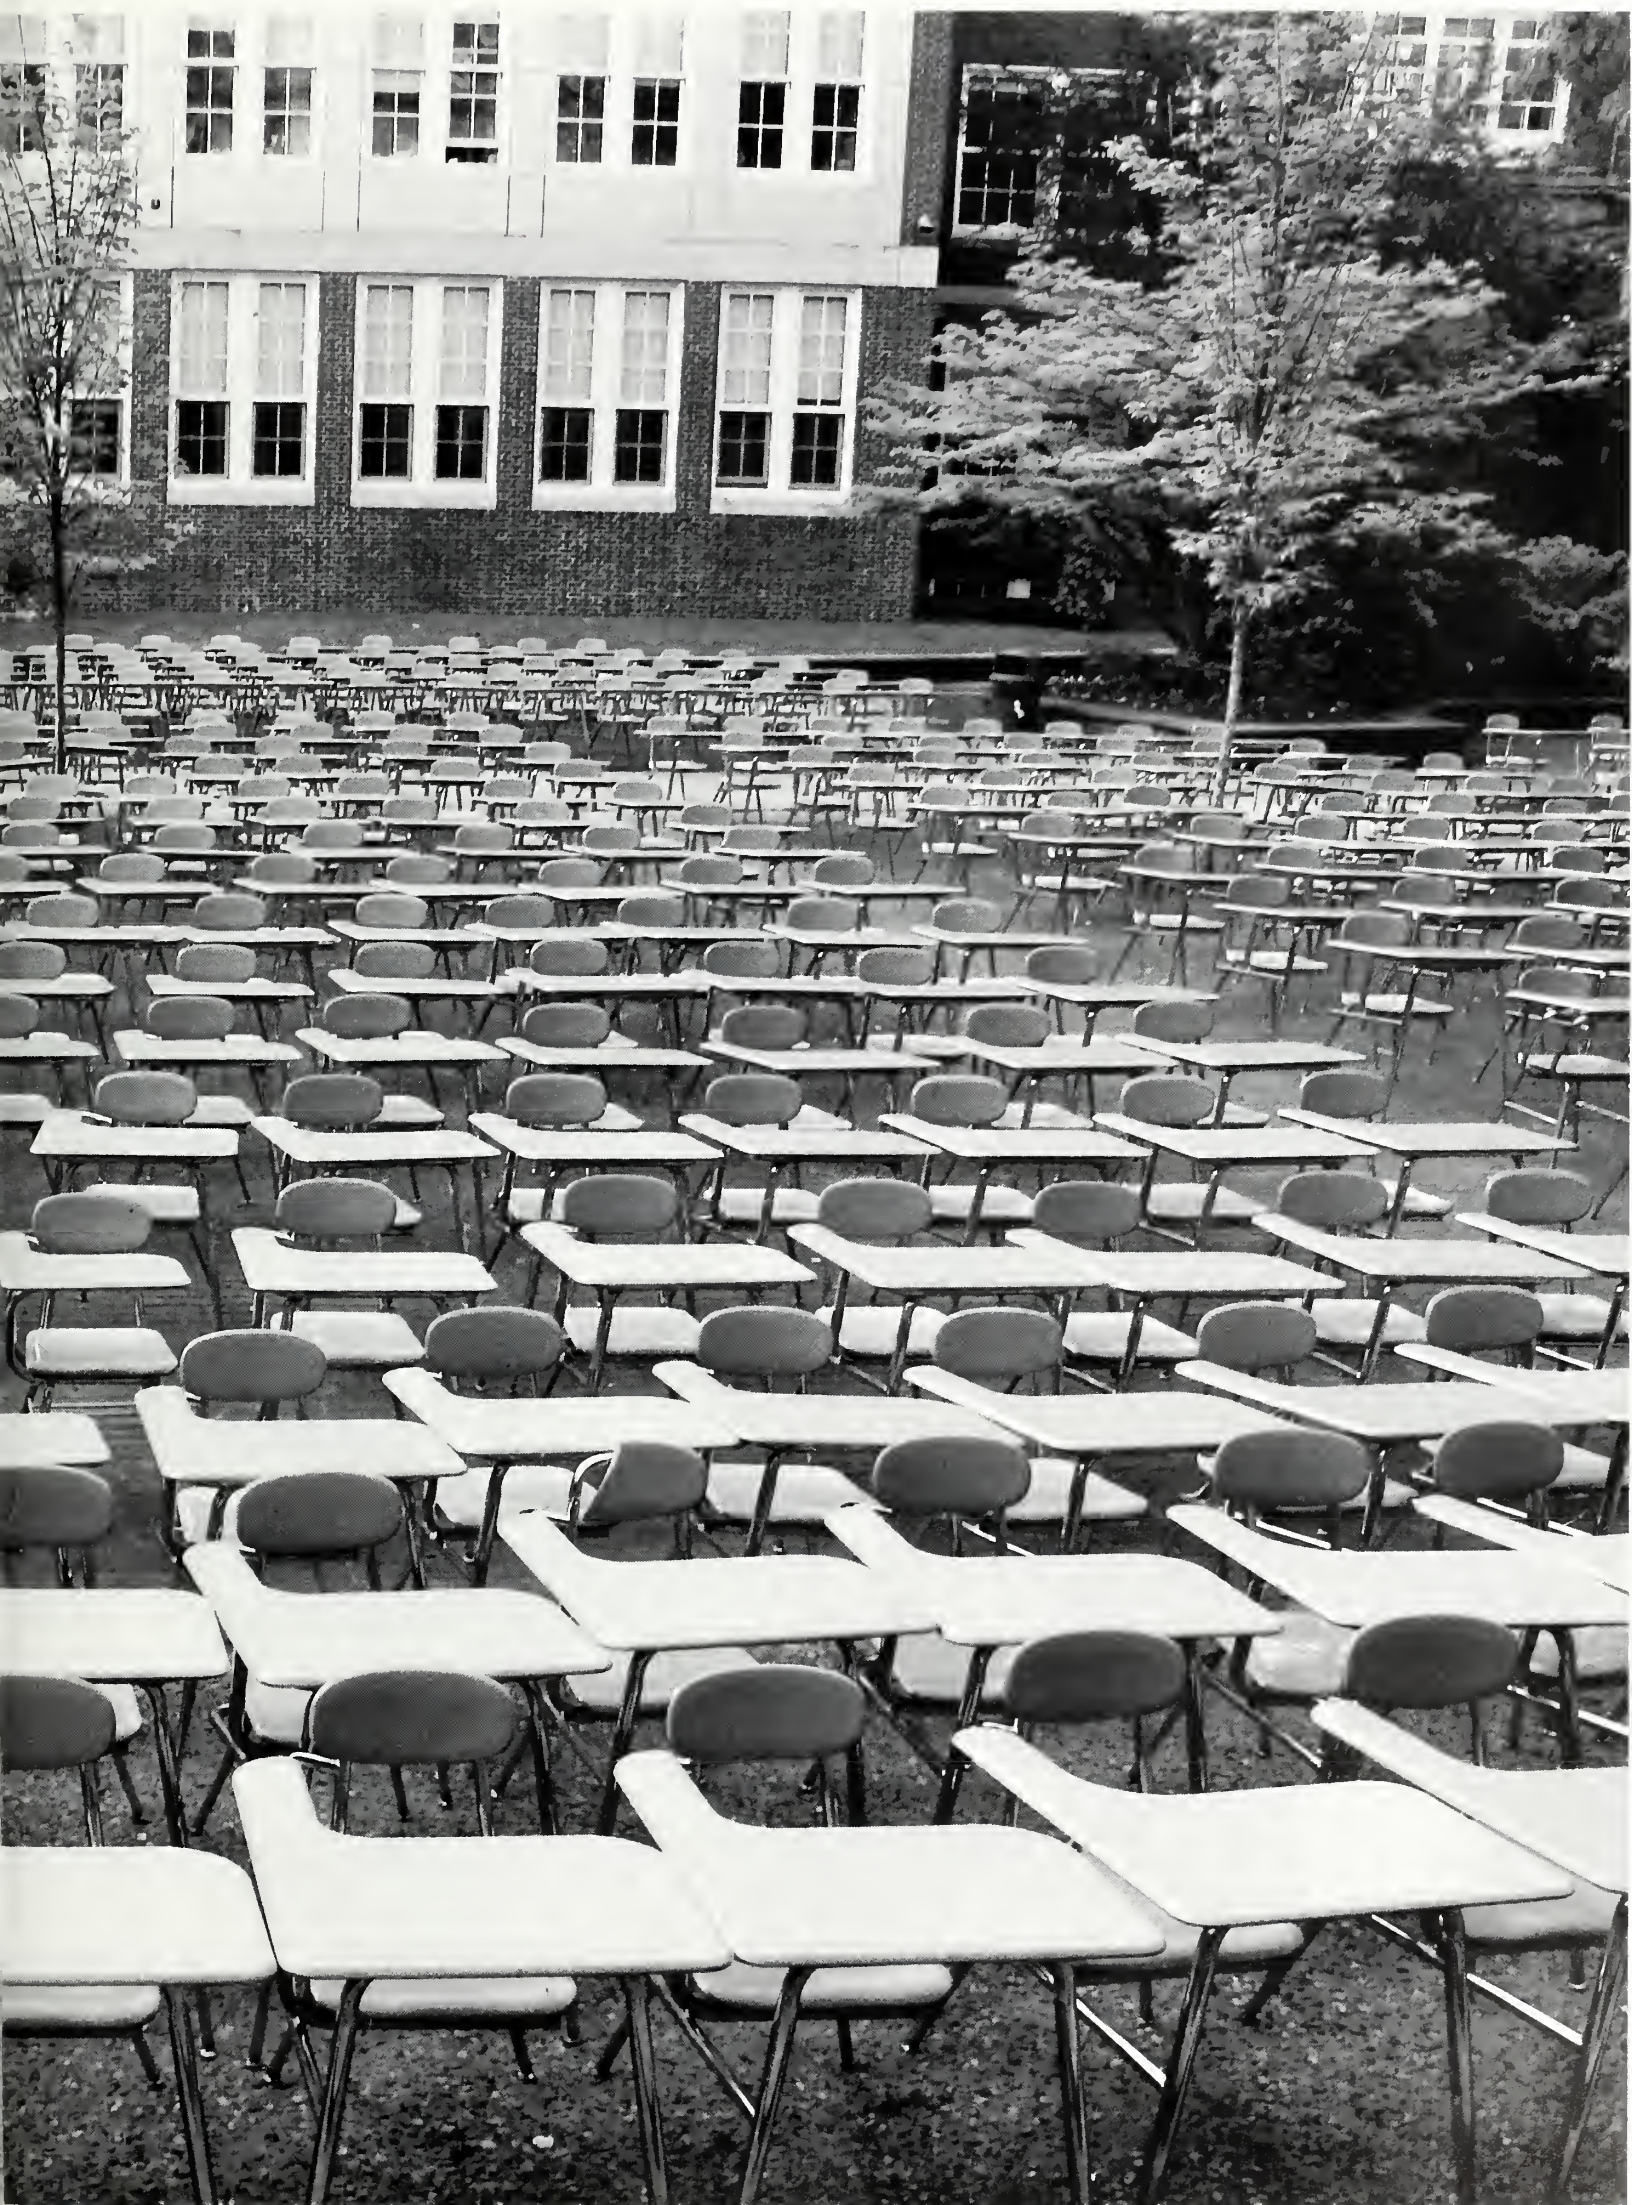

Members of Shailer House, Class of 1961, on the occasion of their 45th reunion, established an ongoing fund to help support the social workers in assisting deserving BHS students and their families during the holidays. Generous donations from more than 50 class members have helped provide holiday meals and other assistance as needs have arisen. The fund is overseen by reunion committee members, Gerry Lynch Heffernan, Jane Flax Lewis, Larry Kaplan, Norm Spack, Norm Levenson and Sue Egdall Michaelson.

No words could describe how we feel without you. We will never cope with the fact that you are no longer with us. We will cherish how much heart you put into helping each and everyone of us. You dedicated your life to make our lives better.

Thank you, Alla

The class of 2008 extends a warm thank you to Mr. Barry Shuman for teaching the youth of Brookline for the past 30 years. We will miss your sense of humor most.

The class of 2008 wishes to acknowledge Mr. Steve Barrasso for his forty years of dedicated service to the Brookline School system. Over the years, Steve has served as a mathematics teacher, Acting Housemaster of Roberts House, Assistant Headmaster, and Director of Human Resources. We wish him well in his retirement.
